This revision replaced the first page.

Chapter 2

The station master checked his watch twice, nodded at the driver, and the last train of the day pulled away. Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them. By evening the market stalls were gone, and only the smell of bread and oranges remained in the square.

When the rain finally arrived, it fell for three days without a pause, and the fields became small lakes. The station master checked his watch twice, nodded at the driver, and the last train of the day pulled away. Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them.

Some people said the town had not changed in a century, while others insisted that everything was different now. Engineers measured the water level every morning and wrote the numbers in a book that nobody else read. In the afternoon the light turned gold, and the old clock in the square ran four minutes late, as it always had.

Chapter 3

Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them. Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them. The library kept its doors open until nine, which made it the warmest place in town during the winter.

When the rain finally arrived, it fell for three days without a pause, and the fields became small lakes. Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them. Children walked to school along the canal, counting boats and arguing about which one was the fastest.

The station master checked his watch twice, nodded at the driver, and the last train of the day pulled away. A new road was planned for the spring, although the council had promised the same thing for eleven years. In the afternoon the light turned gold, and the old clock in the square ran four minutes late, as it always had.