Most visitors came for the market, but a few stayed for the quiet streets and the long view of the hills. When the rain finally arrived, it fell for three days without a pause, and the fields became small lakes.

Section 2: water levels

A new road was planned for the spring, although the council had promised the same thing for eleven years. In the afternoon the light turned gold, and the old clock in the square ran four minutes late, as it always had. Every Friday the musicians gathered near the fountain and played songs that their grandparents had taught them. Engineers measured the water level every morning and wrote the numbers in a book that nobody else read. Children walked to school along the canal, counting boats and arguing about which one was the fastest.
